BRANDT SNEDEKER

Q. You're missing your event in Nashville right now helping prep for the team, but how great is it to see that everything's just going off and running smoothly, carrying on back home?

BRANDT SNEDEKER: Yeah, it's great. You know, I was out there on Monday, got to see kind of the build-out and how (indiscernible) people and see all the players, and seeing the excitement, it was palpable.

Not to be there kind of bums me out because the weather looks fantastic. And it should show great on TV.

But we had some work we had to get done with the Ryder Cup guys this week. So bummed not to be there, but I know it's going to be a first-class event. Pumped to kind of watch it unfold as the week goes on and realize that somebody's going to be kind of punching a card to the PGA TOUR pretty much this week, so it will be pretty cool to see.

Q. A lot of great work going on, Middle Tennessee. How do the proceeds from the Simmons Bank Open directly support those initiatives?

BRANDT SNEDEKER: Yeah, we started our foundation in 2012 so every dollar we raise with this tournament we put right back in to the local community. We partner with between 10 and 20 nonprofits, local nonprofits around the state that really kind of make sure they get hands on, whether it's after-school ministries, junior golf, feeding youth or different programs we have for single parents after school, stuff like that. Trying to make sure every dollar goes back into helping underprivileged youth around Nashville.

It's been a blessing. A lot of fun to get to know some of these organizations and see how they're kind of impacting youth and really making a difference. We feel it's the best way to kind of impact our hometown, our communities by doing that. It's been a lot of fun to watch it grow over the years.
